Where is that in Scripture

I have had numerous conversations over the years with people of many different faith backgrounds. I love these types of conversations when there is an openness to ask and genuinely learn why do Catholics believe what we do. Usually, there comes a point in the conversation where the person asks where a certain practice or belief is stated in scripture. Everything that we believe is rooted in the scriptures, but not everything is explicitly stated in the scriptures because they are not the only way that God's revelation is transmitted to us. There are two ways that God's Revelation is transmitted, they are Sacred Tradition and Sacred Scripture. These are interpreted by the Magisterium. The Magisterium is the bishops (the successors to the apostles) in union with the pope, who is the successor of St. Peter.

So, what is Sacred Tradition? "Therefore, brothers, stand firm and hold fast to the traditions that you were taught, either by an oral statement or by a letter of ours" (2 Thes 2:15). Sacred Tradition comes from the oral teachings of the Apostles who handed on the good news that they received whether from the lips of Christ, from his works and way of life, or at the prompting of the Holy Spirit. They handed this gospel (good news) on orally by their preaching, by their example, and by the institutions that they established (CCC 76). They also passed this good news of salvation through their writings which get compiled into the New Testament.

When we speak of Sacred Tradition, we are speaking of the Tradition handed on by the Apostles. This is distinguished from the various theological, disciplinary, liturgical, or devotional traditions that were born of local churches over time. These local traditions are particular forms, adapted to the different times and places to express the Tradition. So, it is important to note that when we are speaking of tradition, it makes a difference whether the letter "t" is capitalized or lowercase as it denotes different types of traditions. An example of the difference can be seen with the priesthood. The fact that only men can be priests is a Tradition that comes from the Apostles, and the Magisterium of the Church has no authority to change it. However, the practice in the West that priests are celibate (do not get married) is a tradition or custom that came about much later in time. These types of traditions can be retained, modified, or even abandoned under the guidance of the Church's magisterium. So, to be clear, the Church can never change the Tradition that only men can become priests, but she could change the practice of priests being celibate. However, I think that removing the practice of celibacy would be a great loss to the Church, but that is a topic for another bulletin page.

Sacred Tradition and Sacred Scripture are intimately tied together. They flow from the same source, and each one draws from the other to compose the single sacred deposit of the Word of God. It is the Magisterium who has the task of giving an authentic interpretation of the Word of God. The Magisterium is thereby not greater than Scripture or Tradition, rather the Magisterium is its servant. It is the living, teaching office of the Church alone who has the authority of Christ to interpret with the help of the Holy Spirit. It teaches only what has been handed on to it, guards it with dedication and expounds it faithfully.

Jesus Christ established his Church to ensure that fullness of the deposit of faith could be spread throughout the world until his return. When someone asks where is something found in the bible, it is important to explain that the faith that we have received flows from both what the Apostles wrote (Scripture) and what they orally taught (Tradition). The belief that the faith comes from scripture alone was created by Martin Luther in 1517. The Catholic Church has held from the beginning that the faith was transmitted by both Scripture and Tradition.
